The President's Message.

We received this important document by telegraph yesterday afternoon and we surrender the principal portion of our space to it this morning. It is a lengthy document to come over the wires, and yet such are the facilities of the Western Inion office for transmitting news that Mr. John Morgan, the Manager here. and one of his assistants, working two wires, received it in the short space of four hours and a quarter. As to the message itself, it is a very matter of fact document, full of information upon all points touching our foreign and domestic relations, and well worth H. Jacob. George C. Hunter... J. He is rather more of a specie payment man than anything else. That, no doubt, is his preference and his severely pressed on the other side and besought to deal gently with the question, for it was only the other day that the Hon. Mr. KELLY laid his convertible bond scheme before the President, and was agreeably surprised to find how near they were together in their ideas. This interview with KELLY may account for what the President says about issuing currency to the National banks in exchange for bonds and taking it up again, at the pleasure of the banks, less four per cent interest, and giving them back their bonds. He does not feel sure how much currency the country needs, because he does not know how much of it has really disappeared from circulation, owing to causes which he enumerates, but he is causes which he enumerates, but he is opposed to further inflation. And while he is anxious to see money enough to keep every wheel moving yet he does not want enough to make this country a market for foreign products.

Thus it is that the President steers nicely between Scylla and Charybdis on the vexed financial question.
